

DECLARATION OF CECILIA MENJIVAR, Ph.D.

I, Cecilia Menjivar, declare as follows:

I make this declaration based on my own personal knowledge and if called to testify I could and would do so competently as follows:

I. Qualifications

1. I received my Ph.D. in Sociology from the University of California, Davis in 1992. My doctoral dissertation was titled “Salvadoran Migration to the U.S.: The Dynamics of Social Networks in International Migration.”

2. Currently, I am a professor of Sociology at University of California, Los Angeles, where I hold the Dorothy L. Meier Chair in Social Equities. Previously, I was Foundation Distinguished Professor of Sociology at the University of Kansas. And prior to my position at KU, I was on the faculty at Arizona State University for 19 years, where I was Cowden Distinguished Professor with my appointment as full professor.

3. At KU I served on the executive board of the Center for Latin American Studies and co-founded and co-directed the Center for Migration Research. I was a Senior Fellow at the American Immigration Council’s Immigration Policy Center, in 2012-2013. There, I wrote a report on immigrant women as they go through the legalization process and I was one of 18 members of the National Academy of Sciences panel on immigrant integration. I assisted the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in their report, Women on the Run. In addition, I am in charge of summarizing the most important sociological research about and from Central America for the Library of Congress’ Handbook on Latin American Studies, published biannually. For the past 22 years I have taught courses on research methods, immigration, refugees, and gender violence.

4. I am the author or editor of six books addressing violence, gender, and immigration, primarily focusing on the context of Central American states. My first published book, Fragmented Ties: Salvadoran Immigrant Networks in America, was named one of the twelve most influential books on the family since 2000 in a review published in the journal Contemporary Sociology. My second monograph, Enduring Violence: Ladina Women's Lives in Guatemala, was published by the University of California Press in 2011; the Spanish translation was published in Guatemala in 2014. My third book, Immigrant Families, was published in 2016. In addition, I have edited several volumes of essays and articles related to immigration and the lives of Central American and migrant women.

5. Since 1993 I have published more than 150 peer-reviewed scholarly articles, book chapters, and contributions to encyclopedias, many of which present the results of original quantitative and qualitative research about migration to the United States from Central America. A complete list of my publications is included in my C.V. A true and correct copy of my C.V. is attached as Exhibit A.

6. I currently sit on the Editorial Board of ten journals dedicated to the fields of sociology and migration.

7. I have previously provided affidavits or testimony as an expert witness in more than four dozen cases in federal court, in immigration court or asylum proceedings.

8. My opinions derive from the over two decades of study that I have carried out specific to the topic of migration; my hundreds of interviews with migrants and potential migrants from Central America and their families; sociolegal analysis of existing laws in Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador that have been passed to protect women from violence; review of the relevant research on the topic in my field of general migration, and more specifically of migration and gender, and gender and violence in Central America; and my understanding of prevailing norms of social science research methods as developed through my training, scholarship, and teaching.

II. Findings and Opinions

9. I write to address two points. First, the number of migrants entering the United States through the southern border is far lower today than it has been in recent years. The numbers indicate that there is no “surge” of migration. Second, there is no evidence that a policy requiring Central American migrants to remain in Mexico while litigating their asylum claims will serve to deter migration from Latin America.

10. First, immigration across the southwest border has been steadily declining for almost two decades.¹ The number of migrants apprehended by U.S. Border Patrol officials at the U.S.-Mexico border in fiscal year (“FY”) 2018 was 396,579.² In FY 1972, the number was 321,326.³ Between those years, numbers had been much higher: FY 2000 saw a record high of 1,643,679 apprehensions.⁴

11. The decline in apprehensions is not due to a lack of enforcement on the southwest border. The number of Border Patrol agents at the U.S.-Mexico border is almost double the number it was in 2000.⁵ There were 16,605 Border Patrol agents at the southwest border in fiscal year

12. Second, there is no evidence that requiring migrants to wait in Mexico while seeking asylum in the United States will have any effect on migration.

13. Studies of the effect of detention policy have shown that the imposition of harsher conditions on asylum seekers—such as the new policy the government has adopted here—has no deterrent effect on migration. As the UNHCR has made clear, “no empirical evidence is available to give credence to the assumption that the threat of being detained deters irregular migration, or more specifically, discourages persons from seeking asylum. Global migration statistics have been rising regardless of increasingly harsh governmental policies on detention.”⁸

The International Detention Coalition similarly explained that “asylum seekers’ destinations are determined largely by historical, economic, and reputational factors that cannot be influenced by immigration policy makers.”⁹ Even the Department of Homeland Security’s own Advisory Committee on Family Residential Centers has concluded that “[d]espite efforts to deter immigration from [Central American] countries, unaccompanied children and families (mainly mothers and children) continue to brave the treacherous journey to a safer location” rather than face violence in their home countries.¹⁰

14. The same conclusions regarding the failure of immigration detention to deter asylum seekers apply equally to the government’s new policy of forcibly returning asylum seekers to Mexico during the pendency of their immigration cases. The nature of the migrant flows from Central America undercuts any theorized deterrent effect of harsher immigration policies. While the overall number of migrants has decreased dramatically, the number of migrants from the smaller countries in the northern countries of Central America has continued to grow¹¹ and includes a higher percentage of women, children, and families because they are being driven from their homes due to horrific violence in their home countries.¹²

15. Because individuals coming to the United States from the northern part of Central America are driven primarily by violence, a policy of forcing migrants to remain in Mexico is unlikely to deter them from taking the journey to the United States’ southern border. For a refugee, threats to life or freedom in his or her country of origin are a strong push factor that will likely overcome any disincentive created by harsher enforcement policies at the southern border.¹³

The majority of respondents expressed that they

16. The overwhelming majority of women and children crossing the United States' southern border in recent years have been fleeing violence both inside and outside the home in northern Central America—"one of the most dangerous places on earth."¹⁴ In 2015, for example, the national murder rate in El Salvador was 103 homicides per every 100,000 people, 57 per 100,000 in Honduras, and 29.5 per 100,000 in Guatemala.¹⁵ In 2016—the last year from which there is complete data—murder rates were equally striking. El Salvador had the highest murder rate in the world with 82.8 per 100,000 people. Honduras had the second highest (56.5 per 100,000), and Guatemala had the tenth highest (27.3 per 100,000).¹⁶ By comparison, the homicide rate in the United States is approximately 5 per 100,000, and the average global rate is 6 per 100,000.¹⁷

17. Women and children are particularly vulnerable to violence in northern Central America. In 2012, El Salvador and Guatemala had the first and second highest rates of child murder in the world.¹⁸ El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras ranked first, third, and seventh in the world, respectively, in female homicide rates.¹⁹ Journalists report "rampant violence—murders, disappearances, femicide, and acts of torture."²⁰

18. The current wave of violence “is a decades-old crisis that has reached unimaginable and intolerable levels.”²¹ El Salvador even “stood as the world’s homicide capital for part of 2015, reaching an average of one murder every hour over the summer.”²² The UNHCR found that women in particular “have been forced to flee their homelands” in the northern Central America due to a “surging tide of violence,” including rape, assault, extortion, disappearances, exposure to gun fights, and death threats by armed criminal groups.²³ Such violence and victimization are, in fact, the most consistent factors cited by women and children for their migration to the United States.²⁴

19. For women and children fleeing crime and violence in the northern countries of Central America in particular, this means that “no amount of danger or chance of deportation [will be] sufficient to dissuade [them] from leaving.”²⁵ A survey of people still living in the northern region of Central America, for example, suggests that U.S. immigration policy has no significant impact on potential migrants’ decisions to leave northern Central America: “whether a survey respondent viewed migration to the United States as more dangerous, less dangerous, or about the same as it was in 2013 had no impact on whether or not that person reported intentions to migrate. Similarly, all else being equal, individuals who thought deportations had increased in 2014 were just as likely to report intentions to migrate as those individuals who thought deportations had decreased since 2013.”²⁶ This “shows that knowledge of the risks of migration—deportation, border conditions, and treatment in the United States—played no significant role in who had plans to migrate and who did not have such plans.”²⁷

20. A second study used survey data from El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras to assess whether enhanced deterrence efforts by the United States mitigate Central American immigration caused by crime and violence in the country of origin.²⁸ The study revealed that “individuals in El Salvador and Honduras who have experienced crime first hand multiple times are particularly likely to express intentions to migrate” and “persist in their migration plans even if they are fully aware of the dangers they are likely to encounter along the way and the high probability of deportation if they make it to the United States.”²⁹ There is, in fact, an “utter lack of statistical significance” when it comes to U.S. immigration policy on migration from northern Central America, which “raise[s] questions about the effectiveness of current US efforts to deter future emigration from countries with high levels of crime and violence.”³⁰ This means that “views of the dangers of migration to the United States, or the likelihood of deportation, do not seem to influence emigration plans in any meaningful way.”³¹
